| 1 | Gaming has been a controversial issue for many decades now. Entire generations |
| 2 | have been brought up with gamers being considered outcasts, unable to properly |
| 3 | integrate into society. Geeks and nerds were often the victims of bullying and |
| 4 | ridicule. Now, this has changed drastically, since technology has become a vital part |
| 5 | of everyones life and gaming has become a favourite pastime for many people all |
| 6 | over the world. Despite that, many people, especially concerned parents, is very |
| 7 | apprehensive towards gaming and claim that there are many dangers due to it, such |
| 8 | as social isolation and health issues from a sedentary lifestyle. |
| 9 | Despite that, there is more than enough proof that gaming is actually not a threat to |
| 10 | anyone’s health, but it may even provide substantial benefits for avid gamers. To |
| 11 | begin with, the most obvious benefit is that it allows children to become much more |
| 12 | accustomed to new technologies. This is no longer a bonus skill, but a prerequisite |
| 13 | in most jobs, since computers and technology are integral to all workplaces. Most |
| 14 | gamers, especially computer gamers, have a great working knowledge of both |
| 15 | software programs and hardware components, making them very antagonistic in the |
| 16 | workplace. Many different researches have shown that not only do gamers have a better |
| 17 | understanding of technology, but also gain other skills. Shooting games allow them |
| 18 | to have a much better perception of the space they are into. Furthermore, they also |
| 19 | have a much better hand-to-eye coordination than the average human, due to |
| 20 | constant practice. They are also much better at making on-the-spot decisions, as well as |
| 21 | making important choices under a lot of stress, which is especially truth for people |
| 22 | participating in competitive gaming. Even more importantly, games often offer |
| 23 | riddles and mind games for the players to solve, which help them become even more efficient |
| 24 | later on. Notwithstanding, the main argument of the people who are concerned with the |
| 25 | effects of gaming, is that people who are too enthralled with it become social |
| 26 | pariahs . That may have been the case when gaming was not as usual as it is |
| 27 | now, but the situation is completely different today . More specifically, there is a |
| 28 | wide ____ of multiplayer games, which not only allow children to learn how to |
| 29 | cooperate better with others, but also how to cope with specific tasks. |
| 30 | Also, many researches propose that through gaming, scouts can locate people with |
| 31 | leadership skills and train them in order to slowly promote them in management positions. |

HOLIDAY SPIRIT NOT HOLIDAY SPENDING

The meaning of holidays is spending time with family and friends. However, it appears that in the last years, the meaning of holidays has been twisted and now it exclusively revolves around making sure you spend as much money as possible for people that you might not even like that much. What are the main reasons that have led to this phenomenon and how can we combat it as a society?

According to a team of psychologists, the leading factor towards these overspending tendencies is none other than our pride. Statistics have shown that giving a present is not just a symbol of friendship and good will, but that inside the colourful wrapping lie other, more sinister interests. More thoroughly, a present does not just show your love for the other person, but it also directly reflects your own financial status and consists of an indirect display of wealth. Therefore, the more expensive the present, the more financially prosperous you seem to other people.

Leaving all personal factors behind, it is still easy to see how society is also urging people towards overspending during the holiday periods. Throughout the winter holidays, most shops put their products on sale and make special seasonal offers such as "buy two get one for free", something that pushes people to buy more than they really need. In a comparable manner, online shops offer even better deals and higher sales and are advertised all over the internet in a very persistent way which, according to advertisers, "can persuade a fish to buy a bicycle".

A BRIEF GUIDE ON HOW NOT TO OVERSPEND

No matter which of the abovementioned categories you belong to as a consumer, there are always ways for you to control and even combat your holiday overspending urges. Here is a prompt list of advice for you:

- GIVE WHAT YOU CAN: The meaning behind each and every gift you give should be primarily emotional. Spend a good amount of time in finding the most suitable gift for your loved ones. They are surely going to appreciate it.
- EVALUATE THE DEALS ADVERTISED TO YOU: Seek to take advantage of deals that are more suitable to your needs and try to avoid buying items that "might someday come in handy".

- REBUILD YOUR INNER CIRCLE: This is not just an overspending tip but one that can also help you improve your life quality. If you are one of those people who constantly feel the pressure to impress others, then you should probably reassess the nature of the relationships you build with other people and seek to find connections that love you for who you are.
 - UNDERSTAND THE TRUE VALUE OF THINGS: Even if you want to buy something that you do not really need so as to treat yourself, seek to comprehend what it is really worth. You do not always have to get the latest and most contemporary model of things. If you do some thorough research, you will find that, sometimes, the cheaper versions of some things can be as good as the most expensive varieties.

Go Green Collective

Fact Sheet

Changing our lifestyle

There is still time

A recent survey conducted by the National Environmental Organisation has revealed that 7 in 10 Greeks are not aware of how to properly recycle their daily waste and an astonishing 9 out of 10 is oblivious to the impact that landfills have on the environment. This lack of awareness has led Greece to climb on the top of the list of countries with the largest waste discharges on land and water. Nevertheless, there is still time for the Greeks to act by changing their lifestyle and following a zero-waste regime.

What is Zero-Waste

A zero-waste set of principles consists of one's awareness of a product's circle of life and its capacity of being reused or repurposed. In particular, a person with a zero-waste ideology aims at the reduction of waste to the greatest degree possible by opting for products which do not become ineffectual after just one use, but can be reused many times before they reach their expiration date.

Making great changes to your lifestyle might seem intimidating in the beginning, but rest assured that it is much easier than you think. It all starts by establishing a more environmentally thoughtful mindset and starting to ask yourself simple, yet important, questions when you make a purchase. Posing simple questions to yourself concerning the material the product was made from, its recyclability and the number of times you will be able to use it, can help you make smarter and more environmentally friendly purchases, which will enable you to create little to zero waste. It is important to remember that zero-waste is a way of thinking and not a strict set of rules.

Fundamental applications of the zero-waste ethics

The easiest way to apply the zero-waste morals to your daily life is by creating an arsenal of reusable products in your house. Start from the rooms where most of the waste comes from and then, step by step, move to the rest of your household.

Here are some examples of products that will make your kitchen and bathroom less wasteful:

| Kitchen | Bathroom |
|--------------------------|--------------------------|
| -glass tupperware | -cloth sanitary products |
| -cloth towels | -silicone ear cleaners |
| -metal straws | -soap bars |
| -wooden cooking utensils | -bamboo toothbrush |
| -beeswax food wraps | -bulk detergents |

Expand

Sticking to a zero-waste living means that you do not carry this mindset only at home. Instead, you should apply it on your daily routine both inside and outside your living space. Remember to always bring a reusable bag with you when going grocery shopping, try shopping exclusively in second-hand shops and, if you are daring enough, try creating your own garden.

Now answer these 8 questions. Select one answer for each question on your answer sheet.

- 1. What is the text about?
 - a The recycling habits of Greek people.
 - b How to raise awareness about environmental issues.
 - c Strict rules for a zero-waste lifestyle.
 - d How we can go zero-waste.

- 2. According to the text, zero-waste products...
 - a can be used more than once.
 - b cannot be made out of recyclable products.
 - c can only have one purpose.
 - d can stay reusable forever.

- 3. Choose an appropriate title for the third paragraph of the leaflet?
 - a Changing your way of thinking.
 - b Figuring out the zero-waste alternatives.
 - c Ask yourself why you want to make a change.
 - d The basic principles that you should follow.

- 4. What is a question you should ask yourself when purchasing a product?
 - a How much will it cost me in the long run?
 - b Which recycling category does it belong to?

IT TAKES A VILLAGE

Communal upbringing is a parenting practice that is very popular among the African communities. The common mindset shared among the people living in these communities is that a child should be raised by its parents, its extended family and, in most cases, by the entire community. Hence the very famous African proverb: "It takes a village to raise a child", which reflects the logic of giving the child a variety of stimulations and exposing it to all sorts of social situations, while, at the same time, giving the parents the much-needed support that they need and, well, some time to themselves.

Despite the fact that communal upbringing is now practiced mostly in African tribes and communities, we should not view it as a foreign concept, especially since it used to be a common practice in many Western European countries not too long ago. From the middle of the 20th century until the beginning of the 21st, communal upbringing was the way our parents and grandparents were brought up. All of us are well acquainted with that one story that people born in the 60s and 70s love to tell at family gatherings, where they express their longing for the good old times when children played carelessly on sandlots until night-time. It should not come as a surprise to us to learn that these great childhood years are a result of the practice of communal upbringing.

Of course, at that time it was not considered to be a specific parenting style, but more of a traditional value that came with the deep connection with one's family and neighbourly trust. More specifically, not too long ago, families used to be very big. A common household used to accommodate not only the parents of a child, but also their grandparents and their uncles and that meant that the whole family worked together as a unit. When the parents were at work, the grandparents would take care of the child and then, they would have time to play with their cousins while also spending some quality time with their aunts and uncles. Similarly, when the child wanted to go out and play, the family knew that they could trust the other parents that were there to make sure they would come back safe and on time, while also knowing that tomorrow was their day to do that exact same thing for them.

The concept of the nuclear family, even in the aforementioned times, was nothing new despite the prominent communal mindset. However, as time went by, the family model turned into a very private affair in which only the parents are involved in the upbringing process. The factors that led to the strict prominence of the nuclear family model are not very clear, although it is very possible that a lot of distrust was brought to light soon after the first financial crisis emerged all across Europe. Neighbourly bonds were cut off as well and relationships became typical if even existent.

Thinking about parenting today, we can clearly see why communal upbringing was so much better for both parents and children. Raising a child is not an easy mission and it is clear to see that working parents are not able to rest or relax because their responsibilities concerning their family and their work are most of the time extremely time-consuming. At the same time, children are left on their own for long periods of time and that can lead to them growing separation anxiety and feelings of neglect. It is also very interesting to notice how asking for help when it comes to parenting matters is not acceptable and you are in danger of being called a "bad parent" if you do not know how to handle things on your own.

Why have things changed so much and why has communal upbringing come out of the picture? We want to hear your opinion. Visit our website www.familymatters.org and submit your answer on the "IT TAKES A VILLAGE" form.

Now answer these 6 questions. Select one answer for each question on your answer sheet.

1. What is the meaning of the proverb: "It takes a village to raise a child" according to the text?

- a Children are meant to be brought up in rural areas and not in the city landscape.
- b A child should not only be raised by its parents, but also by many other relatives and family friends.
- c Children need to visit their relatives living in the countryside more often in order to become better citizens.
- d Parents should let their children be brought up by other people and have little participation in their upbringing.

2. Why is communal upbringing not an exotic theory?

- a It was applied in numerous countries for many years and only recently came out of the picture.
- b It comes from African tribes that initiated this parenting style.
- c It comes from an old European parenting system based in Germany.
- d Communal upbringing is currently one of the most well-known parenting systems across the world.

3. What benefits did the larger household offer to a child's parents?

- a It followed the traditional values of the time that were then conveyed to the children themselves.
- b It gave them the opportunity to spend time by themselves, while also enforcing solidarity among them.
- c It was a convenient way of them getting served by the rest of their family without having to give back.
- d It allowed the child to become closer with its grandparents and uncles and form firmer bonds with them.

4. Why is the communal upbringing parenting style better than the application of the nuclear family model?

- a Its application is better because children love to grow up with the majority of their relatives in the same house.
- b Because the nuclear family is not composed of both the child's parents and that does not lead to a relaxing upbringing.
- c Parents who raise their children in nuclear families are not considered to be good parents by the people surrounding them.
- d Because parents nowadays spend a lot of hours outside the house and that leads the children that live in nuclear families to feeling alone.

5. Which of the following words describes the meaning of the word "prominent" in the 4th paragraph?
- a Unimportant
 - b Inconspicuous
 - c Predominant
 - d Obscure
6. What is the author's purpose for writing this text?
- a To inform readers.
 - b To oppose a concept.
 - c To raise awareness about an important issue.
 - d To make a political statement.
